PLAYED THE LONE HAND

Billie Brazzelton, of Tucson, Righwaymen and Tough-Wild Career That Was Wound Up by the Treachecy of a Friend-Washingtonias Who Helped Kill Him.

Did you ever hear the story of Billie Brazzelton, the lone highwayman of Arizona? Very few persons in the East have, but memories of this man are deeply written in the minds of old-timers in the far Southwest. Billie was a native of San Francisco, and in very early youth war, by the death of his parents, who were respeciable residents of that green and such part of Frisco, known as the Mission.

compelied to finate for himself.

His native venturesomeness so thrived in his environment that it descended into viciousness. He was without home and had only those hopes which are common more or lets to all boys—that is, to be a conquering here at the edge of a knife or the muzzle of a gun. He roved with his "gang" over the great Sand-dunes, where beautiful Golden Gute Park now blessoms as the rose; over the green bills to the South near what is now Menlo Park; over the wavelashed lands to the northwest, where the Pressio now is. They clambed Twin Peaks, then called

is. They climbed Twin Peaks, then called "The Maiden's Breast," and learned every inch of territory in the abrupt chapparel-grown hills back of where now stands the village of Sanchito.

Billie grew into what is locally termed on the Pacific Slope, a hoodlom, which is the western for "tough." At the tender age of fifteen, Brazzelton killed his first man and escaped the penalty. Single-handed, he is known to have been the author of nine daring stage robberies in New Mexico and Arizona. It was by reason of his lone-hand method of operating that carned for him the sobriquet of the "Lone Highwayman."

He had a close call once when bunted by a posse near Silver City, New Mexico, but by some strategem never explained, be managed to separate them and killed them in detail as they came up. He was one of the best shots who ever monkeyed with a trigger, and could shoot double-handed with accuracy. age of fifteen, Brazzelton killed his first

In addition to his skill with shooting-irons, he was dead game. He came to the end of his tether at last, and was killed by a posse led by Charlie Shibell, sheriff of Pima county, Arizona, a few miles south of Turson.

of Tueson. His end came in this manner: It was a His end came in this manner: It was a red-hot day in July, 1878, that a West-hound stage, driven by Joe Converse and carrying the United States mails and the Wells, Fargo & Co. express box pulled out of Tucson and headed down the Santa Cruz valley, destined for Florence, Arizona, seventy-five miles away in the Gila valley. The trail was part of the Southern overland route from El Paso, Texas, to San Diego, California.

route from El Paso, Texas, to San Diego, California.

Although that particular part of the country had in earlier days been infested with bandits, the officers of the law felt certain that well-directed slogs and the punctual application of extemporaneous rope had discouraged the practice of holding up the coach. No apprehension was felt, and the stage rolled peacefully along till it struck a snag. Eighteen miles west of Tucson is Point of Rocks, a rugged, sun-parched elevation. Suddenly the coach stopped, the driver and occupants, one of whom was Mr. John P. Clum, of the inspectors' division of the Postoffice Department, were covered with a gaping rifle held by a six-foot bandit of athletic build. He was masked and the identity of his clothes was con-cealed by pieces of bagging. He wore "Throw up your hands," is what he said.

The occupants threw up their hands, and their valuables also. The mail peuch and express box were dumped off, and with a few words of farewell the coach moved

She was much affected by the disagreeable task.

Her testimony at times brought expressions of weariness from Attorney Henry C. Davis, of opposing counsel, but there was all the time a court-room full of specagrecable task. tators who did not seem to lose interest Mrs. Webb told of the relations of her deceased sister to herself and her mother; the trouble between them in 1884; the reconciliation, and some of the circumstances of Mrs. Olmstead's death. She was not allowed to tell the circumstances of the interment at Oak Hill.

There was a constant cross-fire between Messrs. Perry and Totten, attorneys for Mrs. Webb, and Mrs. Jere Wilson and Henry C. Davis for the defense. Many exceptions were reserved, and the case will almost certainly go again to the Court Mrs. Webb testified that her sister was, of Appeals. Ans. Webb testified that her sister was from the time she was taken sick at Vinginia Beach, "listless, weary of everything, and wishing only to be let alone." Hermind was misty, and she was weak and miserable. She was in such continuous pain from her head, from swollen feet, and from some ob-struction in her nose, as to be worn out physically and mentally. She said that the suit filed by her sister in 1884 appeared to be brought under the influence of Mr. Oimstead.

During all their lives their mother had given the two sisters almost exactly the same things. If she gave the witness $20, she gave Katie as much.
